Two Great Alaskan Adventures

A NOTE FROM Lois

The past weeks have been challenging to all of us. One day you are enjoying the thoughts of Spring and traveling to some really fun place, and the next moment we are staying in our homes and taking precautions just to get groceries. We learned not to shake hands, or hug, but to social distance. There were so many things that we missed. Life was almost like a reality show, but none of us wanted to star in it.

Classic Groups were packed and ready to go on several tours and flights stopped or states were closing. So we did what we had to do and postponed many of our tours.

In this newsletter you will find enthusiasm for the future. We have many options both short and longer tours to think about or just to enjoy daydreaming about the possibility of returning to some fun place in the world.

It was fortunate that we have been giving out our office emails on each newsletter, so that you could easily reach anyone of us. I also found out that many of you still had my cellphone number and I was happy that you would reach out and call.

I know many of you spent the time reading, cleaning closets, cooking, baking and just relaxing. I also know that some of you are great cooks and I have enjoyed so many pictures on Facebook.

“Life is Good” and all of us in the office are ready to get you started on your dream adventure. 🍷

Does Your Portfolio Reflect Your Risk Tolerance?

There are many types of risk associated with investing. Understanding each type and the effect it may have on your portfolio returns is crucial to your long-term investing success.

When it comes to investing, many people associate risk with losing money. Investing entails different types of risk. Understanding each type -- and the potential return associated with your retirement portfolio -- can help you determine whether your investments are appropriate for your situation.

Examining Risk and Return

Stocks historically have exhibited the highest level of market risk -- or the potential that an investment may lose money in the short term. Over long periods of time, however, stocks have outperformed both bonds and cash investments. This risk/return tradeoff may influence how you allocate your investments. For instance, consider weighting assets that you intend to keep invested for 10 years or more toward stock investments.

Bonds carry their own risks -- credit risk, or the possibility that a bond issuer could default on interest and principal payments; and interest rate risk, the chance that rising interest rates could cause a bond's price to fall. Ascending interest rates historically have influenced the prices of bonds more directly than the prices of stocks. When short-term rates are on the rise, investors may sell older bonds that pay a lower rate of interest -- causing their prices to fall -- in favor of newly issued bonds that pay higher interest rates. On the plus side, bonds historically have exhibited less short-term volatility than stocks, although past performance is no guarantee of future results.

It's also important to look at cash investments, such as 3-month Treasury bills, from a vantage point of risk and return. Although Treasury bills typically experience a low level of volatility, they may be subject to inflation risk -- or the possibility that their returns may not keep pace with the rising cost of goods and services. For this reason, you may want to use cash investments for short-term situations when you expect to access your money within 12 months or less.

Putting Risk in Perspective

Because all investments entail risk, you may want to review your mix of stocks, bonds, and cash investments with an eye toward creating a risk/return profile that is appropriate for your situation. Owning different types of assets may increase your chances of experiencing the benefits associated with each, while mitigating the corresponding risk. Your retirement portfolio won't be risk free, but you will have the confidence of knowing that you've done what you can to manage a potential downside.
